THE ACHILLES' HEEL?

There is both hope and warning in the Central Intelligence Agency's warning that Russia may overtake the United States in the number of technically trained scientists in the next ten years.

But there is hope in the thought that, as the Russian masses receive increased education, they may question the wisdom of communism. Indeed, Allen W. Dulles, director of the CIA, put it well in a recent address when he said:

"Ultimately, however much the Soviets condition a man's mind, however narrowly they permit it to develop, and however much they seek to direct him after he is trained, they cannot in the end prevent him from exercising that critical sense that they, themselves, have caused to be created in him when they gave him an education."

What poetic justice it would be if education of the Russian people finally turned out to be the Achilles' heel of their Red overlords.
